... SEVENDALEHOUSE

History

Sevendale House, situated at the heart of Stevenson Square, is a distinguished Grade II Listed building that characterises the vibrant style of the Northern Quarter.

This building has become an integral part of the city's landscape.

Stevenson Square was built as a speculative development in the 1780s, originally planned as a middle-class residential area. Its developer William Stevenson bought land on the north-east edge of the growing Georgian town and laid out a grid of streets around a rectangular square.

By the early 19th Century the area was transforming with the development of cotton warehouses and mills. This caused a decline in the social status and by the end of the Century, the area was densely developed with commercial buildings alongside workers' housing.

Sevendale House was built as a trade warehouse for I.J. & G.Cooper Ltd in 1903 – 1906 and designed by Manchester architect John Bowden. The warehouse was considered to be innovative at the time, with a steel-frame, concrete floors and internal lightwell.

Sevendale House, purchased in 1986, stands proudly as the flagship of the PJD group. Working patterns have changed continuously since Sevendale was first built. In 2012 the building underwent a refurbishment that set a new standard for Grade A character workspace excellence in the area. The current reposition has been undertaken to adapt the building to the needs of today's new working practices. This is a new era for our community and we'd like you to join it.

 Sevendale House isn't just bricks and mortar; it's a community. Your wellbeing is a key part of making that a reality. We listen and adapt making sure you have everything for a modern way of working.
